

Category:OshoCurrently, there are two kinds of inkjet recording sheets in the market, i.e. plain paper and coated paper. The coated paper has good ink absorbability and fixation, a high whiteness and an excellent image-receiving property and is therefore most widely used in the market. Coated paper comprises a coating layer comprising a resin, a pigment and a water soluble binder, which is provided on a base paper. It is well known that the coating layer also serves as a primer layer in an inkjet recording sheet. For this reason, an inkjet recording sheet needs to comprise a coating layer that is smooth and non-irritating. However, if the coating layer is too smooth, the glossy image quality of the resulting printed image will deteriorate. The problem is particularly serious when printed full color images are desired. In order to achieve a high gloss, it is desirable to use a polyester resin having a high molecular weight in the coating layer of the inkjet recording sheet. However, such resins are insoluble and have poor affinity for the pigment. Therefore, the coating layer must be formed with a sufficient amount of binder to ensure the coating layer being uniform. This results in a much higher coated paper cost, and it is therefore difficult to be competitive against other paper products. In addition, when the coating layer is formed with a large amount of binder, the glossiness of the inkjet recording sheet may deteriorate. Furthermore, since the ink is designed to be absorbed into the coating layer by virtue of the hydrophilic property of the coating layer, in order to achieve a good ink absorbability of the coating layer, it is necessary that the coating layer comprises an appropriate amount of water soluble binder and has a sufficient porosity. Therefore, a considerable amount of solvent is required in the coating composition, which not only increases the cost of raw material, but also causes severe environmental pollution. Accordingly, it is desirable to provide an inkjet recording sheet that has a smooth and high gloss surface and is low in cost.Stagiaire Stagiaire is an international hospitality chain of restaurants which offers a modern menu, table service and fresh ingredients prepared by an experienced team.
