A study was made of the effect of immunomodulators on the development of acute radiation sickness (ARS) in CBA mice during x-ray exposure. The results of the study suggest that immunomodulators in combination with radiosensitization, namely with bacterial lipopolysaccharide, enhance the protective effect of the body. A conclusion is made that the immune system is a principle mediator of the protective effect in the radiation response. RNA interference (RNAi) is a powerful genetic tool that has gained increasing attention in recent years. To date, there has been no report of siRNA screening on the growth of human breast cancer cells using a high-content image-based assay. In this study, we report the screening of novel siRNAs for the knockdown of genes involved in the proliferation of human breast cancer cells using sulforhodamine B (SRB) assay, and subsequent identification of the biological processes involved. We selected two triple-negative breast cancer cell lines, MDA-MB-231 and MCF-7, for the screening of siRNA pools to identify a set of genes that are important for the proliferation of cancer cells. The screening was performed in three independent experiments, and resulted in the identification of 12 siRNAs for subsequent experiments, including the evaluation of their knockdown efficiency, the measurement of the cell cycle status, and their response to 5-fluorouracil treatment. Finally, these results were validated using a different siRNA pool. The findings revealed that the knockdown of several genes involved in the regulation of microtubule dynamics, chromosome segregation, and the mitotic spindle apparatus was correlated with a blockage of cell proliferation, and that these genes are potential targets for the development of
