YUYV stands for «Y (green), U (blue), and UV (red) color space for luminance only. The YUYV color space is a standardized color space that can be used to represent color information for display of images. By combining two components of color space, Y and U, the colors of the original image are more visible, allowing for colors to be more accurately reproduced on the monitor. It is important to note that though the YUYV color space was created as a work-around for loss of green images in other color spaces, it can be used to display images of any color on a monitor with any color space. While the image shown in this image is YUV, it looks the same in YUYV, RGB, and a few other color spaces, such as CMYK. The Y-component represents luminance and is also known as lightness. The U-component represents the amount of blue found in the color. The UV-component represents the amount of red in the color. YUYV vs YUV If you are designing a pixel shader for 3D, you can use YUYV if you want to preserve the luminance of your
