Idiotypes and IgG of glomerular basement membrane immune complexes in SLE. The glomerular immune deposits of 19 patients with systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) were analysed by immunofluorescence and immunoelectron microscopy, using anti-DNA, anti-rabbit IgG, anti-human gamma Fc, anti-human IgG, and rabbit anti-mouse IgG. Glomerular immune deposits were defined as a discrete brightly immunofluorescent line, or as local thickening of the epithelial or endothelial cell layer by light microscopy. These deposits were present in 82% of the cases and were focally associated with subendothelial and mesangial localization in 14% of the cases. All of the light microscopic deposits showed a homogeneous immunofluorescence pattern, i.e. they fluoresced in the same way, and were judged to be anti-DNA by indirect immunofluorescence. In contrast to this, individual glomeruli showed a heterogeneous immunofluorescence pattern. The light microscopic deposits located on the epithelium showed anti-DNA fluorescence, whereas the deposits located in the mesangium fluoresced with anti-gamma Fc antibody. The presence of the latter deposits was verified by electron microscopy. The deposits located in the subendothelium did not have a homogeneous immunofluorescence and were occasionally observed to be located in the lamina rara interna and the lamina densa of the epithelium.
