Russian aviation authorities temporarily grounded their Boeing 737-800s on Wednesday after a flight attendant discovered an unidentified metallic object in a plane's lavatory, which prompted an emergency landing. Flight GA154 had taken off from the Siberian city of Novosibirsk and was due to arrive at its destination in the Siberian city of Ufa at about noon local time when the incident occurred, the Interfax news agency reported, citing a spokesman for Russian aviation. The flight attendant reported the matter to the crew and flight controllers, who quickly requested an emergency landing. The plane made an emergency landing at the Novosibirsk airport's number three runway. The crew of the Boeing 737 found an unusual object in the plane's lavatory after their flight began its descent, RIA Novosti reported, citing Ilya Zorkin, head of the Russian Investigative Committee's aviation branch. Russian aviation investigators are looking into the incident and the Foreign Ministry in Moscow and the Investigative Committee have opened a criminal investigation into the matter, Interfax reported. The Boeing 737, with 156 passengers on board, landed safely at the Novosibirsk airport, where it remained for several hours as Russian aviation authorities investigated the incident, RIA Novosti reported. The Boeing 737's Russian manufacturer, with which Boeing has a contract, has started an investigation into the incident, RIA Novosti reported.

An effect of a phytohormone on the fidelity of DNA replication. The fission yeast Schizosaccharomyces pombe provides a model system to study how plants ensure the replication of chromosomal DNA. In S. pombe, replication of the chromosomes occurs during G1 phase and is promoted by two factors, Cdc6p and Cdt1p. We found that the phytohormone auxin promotes
