Revised. : Prentice Hall Prentice Hall Lab Manual. 1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to tissue-supporting prostheses, and more particularly to an improved bladder prosthesis having a urine impermeable shell with a plurality of perforations for draining urine from the bladder. 2. Description of the Prior Art Bladder and ureteral prostheses are used to replace ureteral or bladder organs which have been removed from a patient during surgery. There are two principal types of bladder prostheses used to replace a patient's bladder. One type is a natural or normal-shaped prosthesis, which is formed to resemble the original organ, and is known as a "silicone" prosthesis. The other type is called a "balloon" prosthesis and is inflated to fill the bladder. "Balloon" prostheses are increasingly being used because they are more easily implanted than silicone prostheses, and can be used in place of bladder silos or Hartmann's pouches. The "balloon" prostheses have been made of a variety of materials, including a silicone elastomer and bladder mucosa. However, problems can arise during urine drainage from the bladder through the walls of the prostheses. In the case of a "silicone" prosthesis, urine can ooze or d0c515b9f4 removal Laser hair removal has become the most popular treatment for removal of unwanted hair. This treatment is based on the principle of selective photothermolysis which is a procedure where laser light is used to induce changes on the hair, thus causing it to fall off. History Laser hair removal was first started by Dr. Mario Cotter in the early 1980s as a single wavelength laser treatments which was known as EL light. It's use for hair removal was further developed by Dr. Alog Pinheiro who introduced a multi-wavelength laser hair removal system known as Multilaser. The original Multi-laser system used 5 wavelengths in infrared range, ranging from 0.75  $\mu\text{m}$  to 0.85  $\mu\text{m}$  at 450 nanometers with spot sizes of 1-2 millimeters. Another development was the 594-nm (blue) laser which is absorbed in epidermal melanin and follicular melanin so giving a greater treatment effect. This was further advanced into the CoolSculpting technique which uses the longer laser wavelength of 1,520 nanometers. With improvements to the laser devices, lasers have become smaller, more safe and easier to use. However, the use of hair removal lasers with shorter wavelengths has brought about the concept of combination treatments that enhances the benefit. Contraindications Hair and skin conditions that make laser therapy inappropriate for patients include: Hair is going grey Hair that has prior history of laser hair removal Hair that has prior history of hair transplantation Hair that has prior history of electrolysis Hair in the frontal scalp area Hair on the scalp which has been recently shaved Hair growth in sensitive areas such as the eyes Hair growth on the lips Preparation Preparation before laser hair removal can be performed by: Psychological examination with psychological or mental health assessment, to determine if the patient has negative feelings about their unwanted hair. Medical history, to exclude medical conditions that make laser therapy inappropriate for a patient. Techniques Pulsed dye laser This technique works by removing hair via selective epilation which is the removal of hair
