If you have used Photoshop or Photoshop Elements in the past, you probably have a lot of knowledge of the program. Now, let's see what these programs have changed since the last version. 1. Saving preferences Since Lightroom 4, Adobe has allowed users to save their preferences, meaning the program's settings and actions. However, this information was previously stored in the Adobe Bridge format, which is now no longer available in Elements 12. Old: To save this information, users had to import a file in the Bridge, making the process tedious and time consuming. New: Users will now have to click the "Options" link on the left panel in order to make the changes. The changes will be saved immediately. New: Users will now have to click the "Options" link on the left panel in order to make the changes. The changes will be saved immediately. New: Users will now have to click the "Edit" icon on the right of the panel (when in the right panel for the first time) in order to edit or create a new preset. The new icons in the left panel are more user friendly, and now allow presets to be edited and created more quickly. 2. Making the most of the new features Although Photoshop Elements 12 has been in the spotlight for its new and improved features, it also has a few issues and problems. However, these problems have been fixed, and people love the new features and how they have been implemented. 1. Layers One of the most common complaints about Photoshop Elements 12 is its new Layers feature. It is not difficult to understand why it did not attract positive feedback: Before: Layers cannot be saved and exported in.png format. It can only be used in Photoshop.psd. Q: Change a table row conditionally with jquery I have a table like this: example 1 example 2 example 3 nope nope nope How can I change the row conditionally based on an ajax call? So for example if an ajax call returns some data it will change the tr#row1 to: new data new data new data Which will then replace the old row with the updated one. I was thinking of using jquery.each loop maybe and just keep changing id="row1" to id="row2". But I don't know how to apply this to an already generated table. Something like: $('#table').html('...'); $('#row1').each(function(){ if(additional data){ $(this).attr('id','row2'); } ... } A: if you are talking about replacing the entire table row, you can use the.replaceWith() jQuery method: $('#table').html('...').replaceWith('#row2'); If you just want to replace a single cell, you can use.html(): $('#row1 td').html('row 2'); A: Use the index. Something like this. (Note that there is an additional tr added for the first row, so that each iteration matches the previous row.)

Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a technique of extracting an image including an image of a person from an input image. 2. Description of the Related Art When image data stored in a recording medium is read out from the recording medium, and the image data is edited or printed out, generally, the image data is processed after a person has been recognized from the image data (hereinafter, this processing will be referred to as "person recognition processing"). For example, when an image including both a face image and an other image that is overlapped with the face image is an image to be processed, the image is divided into a face region and an overlay region based on the face region, the face region is then extracted to be processed. In a conventional image processing apparatus, when the face image is extracted and/or the overlay region is extracted, processing is carried out for each pixel of the image
