Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.4.3)

Please support the Center for Biological Diversity's investigations into the climate impacts of natural gas production. The fracking boom has unleashed a rash of controversial practices and harms in the United States and around the world, including contaminated water, earthquakes, and climate change. Leaders from states and cities are starting to speak out. Governors like New York's Andrew Cuomo and Texas's Greg Abbott have proposed or implemented measures to mitigate the negative effects of fracking, such as drilling regulations, bans on fracking close to schools and hospitals, and greater disclosure by the industry. But new research suggests more is needed. In particular, in a study published today in the journal Science Advances, scientists reveal the potential for the Earth's climate to be changed by fracking, through increased greenhouse gas emissions and changes to groundwater and surface-water chemistry. Earth to fracking, what have we done? We don't know exactly what is behind the recent boom of natural gas production and accompanying increases in fracking. But one factor is likely the higher price of oil, which makes natural gas more profitable. Big players like Chevron are buying up lots of old, less productive natural gas fields in the United States and around the world. The combination of these two factors has led to the rapid expansion of U.S. shale gas production. But if we are to assess the environmental impact of natural gas, we need to dig into fracking practices. A federal program called the United States Geological Survey has compiled extensive data on fracking, including on spills, leak rates, and gas and liquid production volumes in the U.S. and other countries. With the help of a dozen universities, the scientists and land stewards behind this study performed a comprehensive analysis of these numbers using a new statistical technique called inverse distance weighting. What they found was that, for the U.S., the shale gas boom involves an enormous increase in fracking. Their results show that the volume of shale gas production in the U.S. has increased dramatically since 2008, when shale gas was first commercialized. The amount of gas that can be extracted from a single well—called the "proven" resource—has remained relatively constant, but the total amount of gas extracted has skyrocketed. On average, the researchers found, each well in the U.S. produced about 275,000 cubic feet of gas, while producing as many as nearly a million cubic feet of natural gas. That's
