Lough Derg () is a lake in County Roscommon, Ireland. Geography and hydrology Lough Derg is located in the northwest of County Roscommon near the village of Tullymore. The lake's catchment area is in size. Its maximum width is and its surface area is. Surface runoff flowing into the lake is a result of rainfall, snowmelt and snow runoff. The total volume of runoff is per year, of which is via surface runoff. History Two strands of historical evidence point to early inhabitants of the lake area. The first is based on a group of paintings on clay depicting lands held by the Déisi. These are located at the Lough Derg House, Nenagh, and at the holy well of Gorteen. The second strand is based on the headless body of a man discovered in the lake in 1790. The body is the only proven historical evidence of human habitation at Lough Derg prior to the 19th century. In the Middle Ages, Lough Derg was a transit point for pilgrims and travellers between Lough Corrib and Lough Derrin. It is also connected to Lough Gowna via a weir. Ecology In recent years the lake has suffered from pollution and has become increasingly difficult to access for fishing. The total volume of water passing through the outflow of the lake is per year. The main inflow is via an artificial weir constructed in 1996 which processes per year, along with a spring water influx of. This stream is termed the Sallins River. Flora
