Arthur Tucker Arthur Tucker (10 March 1843 – 11 February 1916) was an English cricketer. He was a right-handed batsman and a right-arm fast-medium bowler. He made his first-class debut for Hampshire in the 1870 County Championship against Sussex. Tucker scored 49 in his only first-class innings. He made a further first-class appearance for Hampshire in 1875 against the Gentlemen of England at the Antelope Ground, Eastbourne. He scored 13 in the first innings in which he batted, and 5 runs in the second. He also bowled 12 overs in the Gentlemen of England first-innings, taking figures of 1/15. Tucker died at Winchester, Hampshire on 11 February 1916. External links Arthur Tucker at Cricinfo Arthur Tucker at CricketArchive

Robert Morris is a fast-rising producer of powerful weapons at a time when American spy agencies are racing to master cyber warfare—and when Congress is considering how to protect the U.S. from it. China, Russia, Iran, North Korea, and terrorists like al-Qaida have invested heavily in the cyber weapons that are being forged by small, secretive companies at the intersection of high-tech aerospace, robotics, microelectronics, and precision manufacturing—where the millions of workers in all 50 states put together some of the world's most intricate products. Known as semiconductor fabs, these factories are where crucial components of electronic devices, from smartphones and computers to satellites and missiles, are assembled. But the facilities increasingly make their own intricate hardware to power such devices, and these are called wafers. "Wafers are the basis for almost everything in the U.S. electronics economy," says Matt Blaze, a computer scientist at the University of Pennsylvania. "They make the transistors. They make the chips. Everything that goes into any other type of electronics is based on the semiconductor." It's hard to overstate the importance of the semiconductor industry to the American economy. Fabless semiconductor makers, including Morris' Reynolds Electric, generate over $100 billion a year in revenues, making them bigger businesses than most technology companies. The companies employ an estimated 330,000 workers, or one-tenth of all the manufacturing jobs in California.

America's wafer factories are clustered in the South, primarily around the Piedmont and Tri-Cities regions of Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. The owners of the facilities include the likes of Broadcom, STMicroelectronics, TSMC, GlobalFoundries, Globalfoundries, Cadence, Winbond, and Cypress. The plants have become embedded in the regional economies of the Piedmont Triad region in Tennessee. They are part of local manufacturing supply chains, and have high-paying, highly skilled jobs. Many employees live in the area, and not far away are city centers—like Knoxville, which now has the highest concentration of the industry in the country. The significance of the industry to the region is only becoming more apparent as semiconductor technology advances. In recent years, the industry has moved toward smaller, more efficient fabrication techniques, reducing manufacturing costs while increasing the complexity of wafers.

As the industry matures,
